SUNDER -IN STRENGTH AND DEATHThe gameplay is pretty much plain and simple. It's a cross between Lunar:Silver Star and Uncharted. There's no text, and very little voice, but the object of the game is to die, duh! Gameplay is quite satisfying. The huge open world lets you walk around the world freely in a very open, free-to-explore way. But there's also about a half-dozen zones that you have to enter through different entrances as per usual in an open world environment. These zones give you new weapons, new locations to explore, new abilities for your character, and even (in one case) a new character. In this particular case, in addition to the regular character, we have the character who is always looking down the barrel of a gun. Your job is to take this rogue of a gunslinger, who makes no mistakes, down as the intended storyline is to kill him and are now in possession of his gun.How to Combat: Mostly the same way in Uncharted, but with your guns pointed. The difference being that you are a robber-in-chief in this game, and can simply pick the gun off his dead hand by walking over and hitting the trigger. There's no inventory screen and the best weapon of the game is the last weapon you can get. At about halfway through the game, you actually get a full loot/weapon/ability upgrade that adds a bit of a new twist to the already very satisfying combat system. So far you just fight like a badass, but with the help of that new ability (which can only be used once per level), you can actually shoot a target and watch them magically fire off their unregistered weapon and die, or in a certain case, swing a sword at you and die. In a nutshell, once you've taken down one of the bosses the idea is to go on, collect all the guns, and then use the ability to work through to the next boss fight. Except you can't unlock the last boss without the gun, so that's the end of the game. Exploring: Your best friend is just a classic F.A.Q. First-Person Shooter game. But unlike other first-person shooters, the world, where you navigate, is really quite vast. Most of the time you have no idea where you're headed, just that you want to get a certain object in a certain place. If you ever do get into a c9d1549cdd
